Man Angel

Mensch Engel

review

Geltinger's language is what makes this novel remarkable – the plot itself is pretty straightforward. We meet Leonard Engel a few days after he has finished his Abitur: a hot summer in the Frankonian countryside, in which the nineteen-year-old can finally live out his frustrated sexual drives. He has an affair with Marius, a dark-skinned beau with curly hair, and then with Volker, a prim and proper teacher's pet from his year. At the end of the summer, Engel moves to Vienna, leaving Volker behind for his sister Feline and eventually Tiago, a Brazilian male prostitute. In the whirlpool of his emotions, the reader is catapulted through time, until he hears of Volker's suicide and returns home.

If the storyline of this novel has something of the rock'n'roll swagger of Sturm und Drang, its style is pure Deutscher Expressionismus. The language is rich and rewarding to read, the constantly changing sentence construction varies the narrative's pace, and Geltinger has a way of making familiar things sound strange. He also takes liberties with the conventions of narrative layering: the story is told in intense episodes, cutting out the mundane journeys between places, and jumping back and forth in time. Symbolism is what ties together the stream of words, not plot: the various bodies of water that Engel has to cross or swim through, and the blood that seems to be pumping through his young body with heightened pressure. There is also a touch of magical realism (Engel can talk to animals, or so he thinks), and a meta-textual element (every now and then Engel the writer steps back from Engel the character to question if things really happened as they are described).

Mensch Engel is certainly a remarkable debut. It is packed with linguistic and narrative invention, and in the hands of a translator who could take up the challenge of Geltinger's prose (not to mention the undertones implied in its title, and even in the first name of Boris, the love of Engel's life), there is potential here for a sleeper hit comparable to such other gay coming-of-age stories as Luke Sutherland's Venus a Boy or Hanif Kureishi's Buddha of Suburbia.

press quotes

'Without doubt one of the most stunning debuts of the season. ... Geltinger juggles several perspectives with virtuosity ... vibrant, scintillating, bewildering, outrageous.' – SPIEGEL online

'Gunther Geltinger's first novel stands out as an artfully composed, rampant and immensely brave piece of literature.' – Neue Zürcher Zeitung

'Geltinger shows exceptional talent.' – Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung
